

IT IS TIME FOR ARMENIA TO SETTLE DOWN

After Armenia lost the war, it was the only logical thing that the various factions of the Armenian bourgeoisie would clash over the future of the Armenian bourgeoisie as a class. The vehicle the bourgeoisie ride is the national state, and thus, after spending close to 3 years after the so-called velvet "revolution" that the Armenian bourgeoisie drove this vehicle in circles, something completely within the laws of mechanics happened. The fuel run short; it is time for the Armenian bourgeoisie to decide where to settle the vehicle. For small, non-imperialist bourgeoisie nations, there are not much parking spots. For Armenia specifically, there are just two: The large anti-imperialist forces, and the large imperialist ones.

Before the bourgeoisie embarked in this driving travel, which was proven nothing than indecisive travel placing the country in jeopardy, going in circles over and over again, they were stationed in the anti-imperialist camp, represented by Russia-Iran-China axis. The Armenian bourgeoisie saw that not being able to be imperialist means that

- A) Ability for greater profits is limited
- B) They can't bribe the nation to not go along with capitalism for much

In short, they could not extend the seal of parasitism to the nation as a whole.

Since not great communist movement exists in Armenia, the younger generations think that capitalism is great, and capitalism will one day allow Armenia to live like the westerners. Well, someone must tell them that Armenian capitalism is the normal state of things in regards of capitalism, and that the only reason the west can be so rich is by robbing the planet, by imperializing the smaller and weaker nations. And this pillaging is exactly what happened in Armenia this winter, in its most crudest form.

The Armenian bourgeoisie divided in two camps, the first are ones who wished to remain national bourgeoisie, and keep the Armenian nation into national-bourgeoisie lines. The bourgeoisie would not be able to profit greatly, they would not be able to make Armenians parasites, but by allying with the nations which oppose imperialism, they would at least keep the vehicle intact.

And to be frank, they were smarter to do so. Imperialism can offer a parasitic status to a certain part of the population of the world, and imperialism is in retreat. The status of the parasites in imperialist nations has started going down. In a slow pace really, but still, it is steadily going down.

Thus, the move of the compradorist bourgeoisie - the second group of the bourgeoisie in Armenia, represented at the time by Pashinyan - to push out the national bourgeoisie and move Armenia to compradorthip, was a worthless move. At best, Armenians would become able to travel in a more secure manner, and thus vote parasitic status with their feet, but the imperialist nations are clear that the doors are closed. The Albanians, Romanians, and other eastern Europeans already 'stole' the place of the Armenians as immigrant labour, and even there, we can see that who got out got out. The next generations fo Eastern Europeans will be pretty much closed in their countries, where only the rich ones will be able to send their children abroad.

But it was not only a worthless move, it put the vehicle in grave danger. The new Armenian compradorists saw that completely switching sides would result in great danger from all sides, anti imperialist and imperialist alike. Thus, they were indecisively driving in circles for three years. What followed is that the Azeris, who are compradors of Turkey, and in turn, Turkey is comprador to the cosmopolitan bourgeoisie, saw that since Armenia was basically not completely aligned with anyone, no one would rush to their support either. They understood that this chance to settle the almost 30 years old conflict over Nagorno-Karabakh could not but be grasped. And they grasped this chance. They invaded Artsakh, and they won the war and settled the dispute.

We wrote this when the war was concluded in November 2020:

One thing is obvious: The person who signed this deal of surrender, will be out of government soon, and along with everyone associated with him. It is only natural, once support from nationalists is over your days are numbered. [1]

And we are proven correct some months later. Protests started during the time we wrote this article back in 2020, but the protests entered a new phase some days ago. The army moved and said that Pashinyan should resign. In short, the Armenian bourgeoisie opposed to compradorship understood that their 'Revolution' was the most stupid thing ever, the most idiotic self-destructive measure. They themselves pulled their own eyes out, and they dragged the Armenian nation down with them. Thousands of Armenians died in the war, a war caused by this 'driving in circles' of the Armenian bourgeoisie. The bourgeoisie are now staging a 'coup' to remove Pashinyan, remove the elements of compradorship from power, and re-enter Armenia in a national-bourgeoisie course. Basically, they experimented with the west, and lost from it. And is not the first time. We can quote Stalin here for example, back in 1920:

Armenia, so long martyred and tormented, with its people condemned by the grace of the Entente and the Dashnaks to starvation, ruin and the lot of refugees—this Armenia, deceived by all its “friends,” has now found salvation by proclaiming itself a Soviet land. Neither the false assurances of Britain, the “ancient protector” of Armenian interests, nor Wilson’s celebrated fourteen points, nor yet the ostentatious promises of the League of Nations, with its “mandate” for the administration of Armenia, had saved (or could save!) the Armenians from massacre and physical extermination. Only the idea of Soviet power has brought Armenia peace and the possibility of national renovation. [2]

Which is to say, that Armenia's complete liberation stands with Communism. And if they can't do communism now, at least their partial freedom can be secured by an anti-imperialist orientation, getting further close to anti-imperialist governments, anti-imperialist governments who want to protect Armenia for their own interests, anti-imperialist governments like the one of Russia.

And this is becoming more and more evident to the Armenian nation. There is perhaps some more cards to be played, and so far Pashinyan ordered the sacking of the head of the Army, but the president has yet to comply.

Two things are for sure, and the second is the direct consequence of the first:

- 1)The current government has lost most support of the nationalistic-minded Armenians
- 2)The nationalistic-minded Armenians want to put again Armenia in the anti-imperialist orbit headed by Russia, Iran and China.

The days of people like Pashinyan are finished.

Perhaps, if one could learn some kind of lesson from the defeat at the war, it is that these dangerous driving travels of the Armenian bourgeoisie, if repeated again, this time it won't be just Artsakh which would be lost, but the territorial integrity of Armenia itself would be put in great jeopardy.
